

Chess Grand Master Placed in Check Mateaa

What does Yves Romestan do with all of his time now that he is no longer running the personal communications of the Palais Princiere? We suppose that someone who was chosen for such a prestigious position at the very top of our principality's political echelons would be dedicating his time to running a successful business. Or at least putting to use the high qualifications and skills that got him his position by the side of the Prince in the first place.

Eh bien non, it seems that he has other things on his mind. Over 26,800 other things to be specific...

According to various sources close to the Colonel of Communications, since his checkmate in Monaco, he has developed an addictive habit of putting aside his work and responsibilities in favor of playing blitz games. Having played more than 26,800 games since 2022, he has played chess for an average of two hours a day!

At this rate, it does not surprise us that he was thrown out of the palace, where would he even find the time to work!? It is possible that he is desperately searching for sources of inspiration... The next step will undoubtedly be betting on horse races or playing the lottery...

Read More